An international, scholarly, peer-reviewed journal, Health Sociology Review explores the contribution of sociology and sociological research methods to the understanding of health and illness; to health policy, promotion and practice; and to equity, social justice, social policy and social work.

Special issues are also released as books with their own ISBN for use as course readers or separate sale to non-subscribers. Health Sociologists are invited to contact the editors with proposals for special issues. Contributors to regular issues are requested to follow the Author Guidelines link in the left hand column.

Health Sociology Review is published in association with The Australian Sociological Association (TASA) under the editorship of Dr Fran Collyer in the Department of Sociology and Social Policy at The University of Sydney. Health Sociology Review publishes original theoretical and research articles, literature reviews, symposia, commentaries and book reviews.
